The Treatment of Anger And Aggression in Early Recovery: A Science Based Perspective

Cardwell C. Nuckols, Ph.D.
Registration: 8:30 a.m.
Workshop 9:00 a.m. - 4:00 p.m.

Description:
Often the last thing an alcoholic or addict says prior to relapse is some angry remark such as, "If things are this bad I might as well get drunk/high."

Anger is a common relapse theme in early recovery. Old anger, that cannot be medicated with alcohol and drugs, grows creating interpersonal difficulties with loved ones, and those at work, school, treatment programs or the criminal justice system. Ultimately this anger and rage leads to relapse.

This skills training event will help clinicians understand the latest research on the treatment of anger and aggression and how this research can be used in the counselor's office or group room. Participants can expect to learn "hands on" technique that has been empirically proven to be effective. The goal is to be able to use scientific understanding to assist the alcoholic and addict with anger management problems that are so commonly encountered during the early recovery period.

- Objectives:
Upon completion of this course participants will be able to:
- Understand that anger may be a strategy used to preserve a clients need for control when a situation that causes fear of loss of control (unmanageability) arises.
 - Discuss the current research regarding anger and aggression and how this research can be translated into useful clinical skills
 - Describe empirically proven strategies helpful in working with this angry, potentially aggressive population.
